How will we share our world with robots? How will society change to incorporate a race of stronger, smarter beings? Will Robots be servants, or advertisers taking different forms, tracking our eyes and at all time physically and intellectually superior from the moment of their conception? In each chapter Nourbakhsh imagines a future from a technological standpoint and then explores the social consequences of each prediction. Exciting and frightening in equal measure, it makes me wonder if there will ever be a time in the future when robots become commonplace spoken about the same way as we do a kettle or a toaster?
